General Hawley on Fiat Money. In a speech delivered at Hartford on Friday last General Joseph R. Hawley said : It is not strange that errors flourish for a time. Not since 1840 has a national politi-cal campaign been conducted upon finan-cial issues. It is seventeen years since we suspended specie-payments. They always did now a percentage. gold. They always did pay a percentage, at least, until the Revolutionary war. The utter collapse of continental money, based on the faith and feebly organized confederation, was the last lesson needed after a whole century of suffering. The convention that formed the Constitution was thoroughly devoted to hard money. Daniel Webster said:

"The establishment of a sound and uniform currency was one of the greatest ends contemplated in the adoption of the Constitution. If we could explore all the motives of those who framed and those who supported the Constitution, we should hardly find a more powerful one than this." I can devise no condemnation of paper-

Why did the grocer ask a higher price? Because, on depositing a few hundred dollars at the bank to meet New York debts, he found that the new money, York debts, he found that the new money, not being redeemable in gold or silver un-der any circumstances, and being unable to perform so fully the functions of money, was worth a little less. Therefore the grocer must have a little more of it than he would have needed of gold or silver in order to make his New York purchases.

Your next is to agitate for an increase in your wages. Perhaps you get it, if your employer is able to sell his manufactured goods at a higher price. If he is not, he fights against higher wages or manufactures less or stops. In a little time the operation is repeated. It appears truly to the workman that the times are bard. Everybody is asking him higher prices for the necessaries as well as luxuries of life, and it is very hard to get wages raised proportionately. So there is a cry that money is scarce and a fierce demand that, in the language of the Connectiont Greenback Convention, "to remedy and counteract the evils complained of, the Government shall issue full legaltender paper-money adequate in volumne for the employment of labor, the distribution of its products, the requirements of business," etc. Not a single new idea or proposition in the direction of paper-money has been developed in all the discussions of these last ten years. I can find it all for you in somebody's arguments a century ago, and nearly all of it in the legislation of some colony. Our fathers knew as much at the beginning as some of our modern financiers know at the end. They began with that money-with wampum and beads-and that they learned from the Indians. They ad-
